Continuation of 11. does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because: The applicant argues that Wyman fails to disclose "application rights information that is explicity related to the received content" and "application rights information being operable to enable an operation of one or more disabled operations to operate the received content." The examiner disagrees with the applicant's assertion, Wyman discloses that of a management policy that indicates that the context defines how the licensed product is to be used, such as by a particular CPU, a certain user, or by a particular process, see column 6, lines 50-61 and column 11, lines 22-37. This is explicit information related to the received content. The teachings of Schull are relied upon for disclosing of having disabled operations that are to be enabled, more specifically, advanced features of the teachings of Schull are unlocked, see column 3, lines 50-59. The combination of Schull and Wyman are relied upon for meeting the limitation "application rights information being operable to enable an operation of one or more disabled operations to operate the received content".
